On August 6, 1945, an atomic bomb was dropped in Hiroshima. Two-years-old Sasaki Sadako survived, but at least 130,000 people died by the end of that year.

In the elementary school, Sadako wanted to be a PE teacher when she grew up. She was selected as a member of the relay team for the school's sports day. It made her very happy. After the sports day, Sadako suddenly became sick. "It will be difficult for her to live for more than one year," a doctors said to Sadako's parents.

In the hospital, Sadako remembered the custom, "If you make a thousand cranes, you will get well." She made many cranes and made a wish on them for good health. She didn't lose her hope, but her life ended when she was only twelve. It was difficult for her friends to accept her death.

Today, many people send paper cranes to Hiroshima from around the world. The cranes are for Sadako and for peace.
