What are the odds that two brothers would meet their deaths a year apart in the same moped at the hands of the same cab driver? Normally, one would say the odds are pretty low. However, in a place like Bermuda, with a population of not more than 55,000 from 1970 to 1975, the chances were kind of high.

In 1974, one of two brothers died on a road in Bermuda while riding his moped. He collided with an occupied cab. One year later, his brother drove his moped, got into an accident with the same cab, driven by the same person and carrying the same passenger. You would think that it can't get any more curious than that, but both brothers were 17 when they died.

The details of the two brothers' deaths are indeed so parallel that the story sounds like an urban legend.

I'm investigating a case for my final paper in one of my subjects in school. My professor only gave us the following information about an accident that happened in Bermuda:

- a. Date of the accident: March 6, 2007
- b. The victim was 16 years old at the time of the accident
- c. The driver of the car in the accident was sentenced to one year in prison

My professor wants us to give a detailed report on what really happened in the accident. What should I do to get the information I need for my report?
